FEBRUARY IS LOW-VISION AWARENESS MONTH:
TIPS FOR LOW VISION

LANCASTER, Penna. (Feb. 22, 2023) – People living with low vision often have problems with reading and their daily tasks. There are tips that can help people identify if they have low vision and how to deal with it so they can continue to live independently.

Low vision means not being able to see while enough to do things like read, drive, or recognize people's faces.

"February is Low-Vision Awareness Month and we have some tips that can help make it easier for them to live with low vision," said Dennis Steiner, VisionCorps President/CEO. "In addition to trying out these tips, we encourage people to get an annual dilated eye exam. It's good to find out about your eyesight and track whether it is staying the same or possibly getting worse."

Some tips to help with low vision:

- Use brighter lights at home or work – overhead lighting helps eliminate shadows.
- Use bright white and/or LED bulbs instead of soft white lighting bulbs.
- Sit with your back toward a window or a light.
- Use contrast to distinguish between items – a light-colored object should be placed against a dark background or vice-versa. For example, use a cutting board that is a different color to contrast with the color of the item you are cutting.
- Wear anti-glare sunglasses.
- Use flashlights or the light on your cell phone to see menus with small type or to help with using keys.
- Magnifiers can help with reading and other close-up activities.

"It is better to see a vision rehabilitation specialist for help with magnifiers," said Steiner. "You often need to try various devices before you find the one with the correct power one that works for you. Magnifiers sold in stores or online may not be made for people with low vision or extensive vision loss.”

Steiner encouraged people with low vision to contact VisionCorps to find out more about rehabilitation services that may be available to them at no cost.
